Atkinson's Saturday Evening Post

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER, DEVOTED TO LITERATURE, MORALITY, SCIENCE, NEWS, AGRICULTURE AND AMUSEMENT.

Vol. XIV. PHILADELPHIA, JULY 25, 1835. Whole No. 730.

For the Saturday Evening Post.

THE YOUNG SOLDIER'S FUNERAL.

BY MRS. H. M. DODGE.

Hark to the sound of the death drum's beat,
Sadly it falls on the soldier's ear,
And he who stood in the battle's heat,
Gives to that passing sound a tear:
For the soldier's heart tho' val'rous and brave,
Can as nobly feel, as nobly save.

Again that death note fills the gale!
See the dark bier from the gates emerge!
Hear ye that deep and lonely wail?
'Tis the young soldier's funeral dirge!
In the midst of life and glory's dawn,
He was called to the land of his father's home.

But where's the bearer of the warrior dead,
Where's the darkly nodding plume,
And where's the mourning throng that tread,
Around the fallen hero's tomb?
Ah, where are the arms to the hero dear?
I see them not on that gloomy bier!

Ah, few were his gears,—his battle steed
Was young in strength,—his valor's beam
And the bright fame of the noble dead,
Slumber'd still in his youthful dream,
And he who weeps o'er his humble grave—
Weeps for the fall of the future brave!

But see that pale, that trembling form,
That presses close to the silent bier?
On her widow'd cheek the tear is warm,
And her deep groans fill the soldier's ear,
Alas, she is in the world alone,
For that fallen youth was her only son!

THE SUICIDE:

A TALE OF THE ANCIENT DOMINION.

Continued from last Number.

Eight or ten patrician dwellings had been thus visited in succession—Sir Ralph Armstead's making the last, where the rollicksome crew broke up and dispersed in all directions. Mr. Dallas and his peerless damsel regained a day or two after the ball, as well as Mr. Rudolph, to hem the friend had invited to accompany them home. Of course, this politic lover, who was vibrating between the "beauty of beauties," and another rich match, was full prompt to wait upon the father and daughter, even while pleading with well dissembled hesitation, a host of opposing engagements. But Hetty had hardly begun to rejoice in the prospect of his company, ere she heard to her infinite consternation of her cousin Patsey's probable presence at the same time. She had been to Vernon Hill only a few days before the festival; and though it then seemed likely that her aunt's gradual amendment would soon liberate the gentle nurse, who had so devoted herself to her sick chamber—Miss Dallas was in such a whirl of joyous anticipation as entirely to overlook the improved state of the patient and every thing else unconnected with her approaching triumph.—Mr Dallas and Lady Joanna were, however, more observant—and found their interest for Miss Vernon to recur herself by a change of air readily acquiesced in: of course, her particular residence was the appointed place of recreation. But this visitation—for it was deemed such, by her old play mate—was a relatively distant evil—Cyprian's society, an immediate and delicious enjoyment so long the object of her wishes, in high spirits, there to illuminate in the quiet and seclusion so grateful after the excitement of their protracted jubilee. The lord of the manor was present, possessed of a private and most agreeable subject of contemplation and arrangement in the proposed visit, at an early day, of him, whom he loved to believe, his future son-in-law. Meanwhile the lovers, passing day after day in mutual enjoyment—were left pretty much to their own devices. Nothing so tended to facilitate the fruition of our hapless heroine, as her being thus thrown into close and constant association with the subtle and unscrupulous wooer, whose designs upon her were purely mercenary, or worse still, selfishly profligate. Not that he was insensible to the rare charms enclasped by such depth of fervent tenderness—on the contrary, they had inspired him with a passion as vehement and unholy as ever led to the betrayal of confiding beauty. His first point and principal motive in coming to Dalton-dale, was to ascertain whether the fortune she had exaggerated the expectations of this sole daughter, if they turned out to correspond with the dictates of justice and the vast amount of the family pecuniary embarrassments, demanded immediate elopement; for the consummate plotter concluded it useless to seek the paternal consent to their union. If she proved comparatively portionless, and knowing Mr. Dallas to be a strong adherent and upholder of the Salick law, he was not unprepared to hear of his intention to put off his female scion with next to nothing. Rudolph's aim and end was to degrade the object of vows so solemn and reiterated as to border upon self imprecation, into the sharer, perhaps victim of a loose intrigue.

Meanwhile he was rapidly acquiring unbounded influence over these affections which seared towards the present so long neglected child of his parent, and whom she stood so much in awe of, withdrawn through envy from her unconscious cousin—and greatly cooled by time and the absence of that dear brother so long away—clung with all the warmth and intensity of woman's first love to the serpent seducer who repaid it thus vilely. For so yet the feelings of Cyprian Dallas, in spite of the deed and malicious comparison with those which she awakened, like the pure sun of the poet, shone in all their coldness and corruption, beside the reeking and sulphurous glare of infernal fire. But we have formerly stated her passions as hasty and totally unregulated—her heart to be the hot-house of vain and violent impulses, and each protestation she listened to every one more fervid than the last, was the spirited master of her inmost soul, tended to beguile her away from the path of duty and virtue. The first false step was her clandestine reception of Rudolph's addresses. He pretended scruples of conscience, forsooth, to deprive them; his sensitive and passionate nature could not be pacified, or resign itself to the bliss of implicit confidence till assured that his idol loved him for himself alone—that he owed nothing to the authority of father, or the trappings and appendages of wealth and rank beyond the loftiest hopes of American ambition. Once satisfied of her disinterested preference, the revelation of their reciprocal attachment was to be co-incident with it; and in proof of Hetty's sincerity and superiority to venal motives, her insidious suitor exacted every concession on her part, without the slightest return on his part. At the same time, he appealed to those very accusations, which he professed so much to distrust, by hints calculated to work upon her pride and love of show—and the high position of her family, and the unexpectedness of the most exaggerated ideas of his actual dignity and estate. All was to be disclosed—every day dream confirmed when her perfect reliance on his honour should enable him to fulfil to the letter every and all of his promises. Of course, this politic lover, who was vibrating between the "beauty of beauties," and another rich match, was full prompt to wait upon the father and daughter, even while pleading with well dissembled hesitation, a host of opposing engagements. But Hetty had hardly begun to rejoice in the prospect of his company, ere she heard to her infinite consternation of her cousin Patsey's probable presence at the same time. She had been to Vernon Hill only a few days before the festival; and though it then seemed likely that her aunt's gradual amendment would soon liberate the gentle nurse, who had so devoted herself to her sick chamber—Miss Dallas was in such a whirl of joyous anticipation as entirely to overlook the improved state of the patient and every thing else unconnected with her approaching triumph.—Mr Dallas and Lady Joanna were, however, more observant—and found their interest for Miss Vernon to recur herself by a change of air readily acquiesced in: of course, her particular residence was the appointed place of recreation. But this visitation—for it was deemed such, by her old play mate—was a relatively distant evil—Cyprian's society, an immediate and delicious enjoyment so long the object of her wishes, in high spirits, there to illuminate in the quiet and seclusion so grateful after the excitement of their protracted jubilee. The lord of the manor was present, possessed of a private and most agreeable subject of contemplation and arrangement in the proposed visit, at an early day, of him, whom he loved to believe, his future son-in-law. Meanwhile the lovers, passing day after day in mutual enjoyment—were left pretty much to their own devices. Nothing so tended to facilitate the fruition of our hapless heroine, as her being thus thrown into close and constant association with the subtle and unscrupulous wooer, whose designs upon her were purely mercenary, or worse still, selfishly profligate. Not that he was insensible to the rare charms enclasped by such depth of fervent tenderness—on the contrary, they had inspired him with a passion as vehement and unholy as ever led to the betrayal of confiding beauty. His first point and principal motive in coming to Dalton-dale, was to ascertain whether the fortune she had exaggerated the expectations of this sole daughter, if they turned out to correspond with the dictates of justice and the vast amount of the family pecuniary embarrassments, demanded immediate elopement; for the consummate plotter concluded it useless to seek the paternal consent to their union. If she proved comparatively portionless, and knowing Mr. Dallas to be a strong adherent and upholder of the Salick law, he was not unprepared to hear of his intention to put off his female scion with next to nothing. Rudolph's aim and end was to degrade the object of vows so solemn and reiterated as to border upon self imprecation, into the sharer, perhaps victim of a loose intrigue.

Meanwhile he was rapidly acquiring unbounded influence over these affections which seared towards the present so long neglected child of his parent, and whom she stood so much in awe of, withdrawn through envy from her unconscious cousin—and greatly cooled by time and the absence of that dear brother so long away—clung with all the warmth and intensity of woman's first love to the serpent seducer who repaid it thus vilely. For so yet the feelings of Cyprian Dallas, in spite of the deed and malicious comparison with those which she awakened, like the pure sun of the poet, shone in all their coldness and corruption, beside the reeking and sulphurous glare of infernal fire. But we have formerly stated her passions as hasty and totally unregulated—her heart to be the hot-house of vain and violent impulses, and each protestation she listened to every one more fervid than the last, was the spirited master of her inmost soul, tended to beguile her away from the path of duty and virtue. The first false step was her clandestine reception of Rudolph's addresses. He pretended scruples of conscience, forsooth, to deprive her of them; his sensitive and passionate nature could not be pacified, or resign itself to the bliss of implicit confidence till assured that he idol loved him for himself alone—that he owed nothing to the authority of father, or the trappings and appendages of wealth and rank beyond the loftiest hopes of American ambition. Once satisfied of her disinterested preference, the revelation of their reciprocal attachment was to be co-incident with it; and in proof of Hetty's sincerity and superiority to venal motives, her insidious suitor exacted every concession on her part, without the slightest return on his part. At the same time, he appealed to those very accusations, which he professed so much to distrust, by hints calculated to work upon her pride and love of show—and the high position of her family, and the unexpectedness of the most exaggerated ideas of his actual dignity and estate. All was to be disclosed—every day dream confirmed when her perfect reliance on his honour should enable him to fulfil to the letter every and all of his promises. Of course, this politic lover, who was vibrating between the "beauty of beauties," and another rich match, was full prompt to wait upon the father and daugh ter, even while pleading with well dissembled hesitation, a host of opposing engagements. But Hetty had hardly begun to rejoice in the prospect of his company, ere she heard to her infinite consternation of her cousin Patsey's probable presence at the same time. She had been to Vernon Hill only a few days before the festival; and though it then seemed likely that her aunt's gradual amendment would soon liberate the gentle nurse, who had so devoted herself to her sick chamber—Miss Dallas was in such a whirl of joyous anticipation as entirely to overlook the improved state of the patient and every thing else unconnected with her approaching triumph.—Mr Dallas and Lady Joanna were, however, more observant—and found their interest for Miss Vernon to recur herself by a change of air readily acquiesced in: of course, her particular residence was the appointed place of recreation. But this visitation—for it was deemed such, by her old play mate—was a relatively distant evil—Cyprian's society, an immediate and delicious enjoyment so long the object of her wishes, in high spirits, there to illuminate in the quiet and seclusion so grateful after the excitement of their protracted jubilee. The lord of the manor was present, possessed of a private and most agreeable subject of contemplation and arrangement in the proposed visit, at an early day, of him, whom he loved to believe, his future son-in-law. Meanwhile the lovers, passing day after day in mutual enjoyment—were left pretty much to their own devices. Nothing so tended to facilitate the fruition of our hapless heroine, as her being thus thrown into close and constant association with the subtle and unscrupulous wooer, whose designs upon her were purely mercenary, or worse still, selfishly profligate. Not that he was insensible to the rare charms enclasped by such depth of fervent tenderness—on the contrary, they had inspired him with a passion as vehement and unholy as ever led to the betrayal of confiding beauty. His first point and principal motive in coming to Dalton-dale, was to ascertain whether the fortune she had exaggerated the expectations of this sole daughter, if they turned out to correspond with the dictates of justice and the vast amount of the family pecuniary embarrassments, demanded immediate elopement; for the consummate plotter concluded it useless to seek the paternal consent to their union. If she proved comparatively portionless, and knowing Mr. Dallas to be a strong adherent and upholder of the Salick law, he was not unprepared to hear of his intention to put off his female scion with next to nothing. Rudolph's aim and end was to degrade the object of vows so solemn and reiterated as to border upon self imprecation, into the sharer, perhaps victim of a loose intrigue.

Meanwhile he was rapidly acquiring unbounded influence over these affections which seared towards the present so long neglected child of his parent, and whom she stood so much in awe of, withdrawn through envy from her unconscious cousin—and greatly cooled by time and the absence of that dear brother so long away—clung with all the warmth and intensity of woman's first love to the serpent seducer who repaid it thus vilely. For so yet the feelings of Cyprian Dallas, in spite of the deed and malicious comparison with those which she awakened, like the pure sun of the poet, shone in all their coldness and corruption, beside the reeking and sulphurous glare of infernal fire. But we have formerly stated her passions as hasty and totally unregulated—her heart to be the hot-house of vain and violent impulses, and each protestation she listened to every one more fervid than the last, was the spirited master of her inmost soul, tended to beguile her away from the path of duty and virtue. The first false step was her clandestine reception of Rudolph's addresses. He pretended scruples of conscience, forsooth, to deprive

For the Saturday Evening Post.

AN EVENING AT NEIL'S—No. 10.

Squibb. To Sir Oracle, and Fustian, who appear occupied in peering over the tinsels, and to have been the spectators of the several jocose merry celebrations of the night of Sam.

Gentlemen, we have been very negligent of late—Neil declares with a frown smoaking somewhat of his profaneness, that our late proceedings have proved as equal as the rumings of his Poughkeepsie!

Fustian. And as stale as Birch's wit—Eh, Squibb?

Squibb. He further deposes that unless you are more regular in your attendance, he will have to decline the receipt of the extra cash,—which some you have held your wings at his house, he has found barely sufficient to answer your demands. Now, he does not find the consumption per week sufficiently great to warrant a continuance.

Sir Oracle. Did you note, Fustian, how patronizing John looked as we entered but the moment he observed Squibb's handsome phiz, as that worthy crossed the threshold, his brow relaxed from its rigidity, and his eye became relumed with the usual liard expression. You are evidently a favourite, Squibb!

Squibb. Nothing more than the crumbs, which Neil bestows upon me, through his sense of the superior merits of my colleagues. I had half disposed to strike for a more equal quota.

Fustian. That may be easily effected. Call in three glasses—pay for them now, and liquidate the amount scored against you. Do this, and enter host of the Bear will be with you, to the death, despite your prepossessing to rail at the sappy flavor of his ale.

Squibb. Amiable advice! will you do me the favour to explain those chalk marks which grace you door, ambiguously surrounded with an "Eye" I may read them—I should say that John had been of tener called upon to add to the number that Ned has thought in accordance with his opinion of you as "Hymen sublimis fide."

Sir Oracle. "When Greek meets Greek &c."—Gentlemen, I would advise that boozifiers be suspended, and as a punishment for your violation of the harmony of the club, I award, that you Squibb, call in three glasses of ale, and that Fustian pay for them.

Fustian. Shame upon such a verdict—have you forgotten that "cracks" have fallen—think of my wife and children!

Squibb. I will thank you, Sir Oracle, to search that hell—John, across Poughkeepsie—charge it to Fustian. Nay, look not so doubtingly—I will be his security for the amount. But mind, thou drawer of corks, for this night only—no longer.

Fustian. Security! you—

Squibb. How admirably our relative situations are adapted to the beautiful scenes of the western hemisphere, who notified the public of the loss of his lovely consort, in the following impassioned strain, which I will somewhat pervert to suit the present exigency.

"This is all persons to forewarn
They must not Fustian trust,
To the amount of one cent,
Or lose it all, they must."

John, bear this in mind—Fustian, your health!

Fustian. What a mad cap you are—one would almost be tempted to believe that you had been under the medical care of the Thomsonians, and lost your wits in the steam bath.

Sir Oracle. Rather say—enfeebled in the nervous, became a quack himself—and in lieu of common sense learned the art of compounding quack medicines.

Fustian. Nay! we will not be so severe as to suppose him such an egregious ass.

Squibb. I thank you Fustian—for I assure you I have no wish to be considered a member of that learned body.

Fustian. The os os, or Thomsonians?

Squibb. Squills and Cherybids!

Sir Oracle. It strikes me you are jocular—

Squibb. For heaven's sake! Let nothing strike you, we have heard of so many lately that

"My ear is pained—my very soul is sad,
With every day's report of strike."

Sir Oracle. Why it cannot certainly be, that you, who have ever manifested a disposition to compromising humility against oppression, and professed so much love for the people, and their interests; you, are not opposed to the late measures of the working men.

Squibb. I am not against their measures—but the mode in which they effected their purpose—methinks they would have gained their ends more effectually, and certainly with less opposition, had they pursued a less noisy course.

Fustian. There was nothing turbulent in their proceedings, on the contrary, every thing was conducted with harmony and unanimity.

Squibb. There is no doubt as to their unanimity, if we may so term the unanimous opinion of that characterized their proceedings. But I conceive that their parade in marching through the streets was ill calculated to excite feelings of ill will in the minds of their employers; not from motives of reluctance to grant the strikers, their wishes, but from disclosure, at the violent, and abrupt tone in which their demand was preferred.

Sir Oracle. Could they otherwise have affected their purpose?

Squibb. Undoubtedly—we have a confirmation of the fact in the resolutions passed by those employing trades, whose journeymen instead of quietly assembling in the public parlors—repaired in a body to their employers, and were met at once, with prompt redress.

Fustian. They had the strikes in view, and knew that unless they did comply, their men would follow the same course.

Squibb. On conversing with several master carpenters and masons, whose journeymen turned out, I have learned that as soon as they understood that a strike was in contemplation—they stated their willingness to accede to the terms demanded, and advised their men not to lay aside their business—as they were willing to give the advance of wages and time asked.

Sir Oracle. Yet had the journeymen complied, they would have been deviating from the general interest, which requires, that a popular measure to succeed, must be simultaneous and united. Had these individuals acted as a body with their employers wishes, they would have left the majority to struggle with the whole weight of the opposition, and found themselves in the end obliged to resume their original position.

Squibb. Your view of the case is a strange one, truly. They would not only have gained their own ends, but proved a precedent for the reluctant employers of their craft. These latter, when they saw how their brethren had acted would be forced to co-operate, and the journeymen could have gone through their revolutions, without employing a single minute of their hour. But no! By adopting this course, they would not have been afforded an opportunity of showing their independence, and taxing their employers powers of sufferance, and to do this, they must parade along our streets, ingulfing their own cause. The business of their employers—and all, to gain—what?

Fustian. A triumph over an enslaving system, which had held down its victims to, almost slavery, giving them in return but perseverance, and industry, a mere subsistance, totally crushing the expense of many expensive of a rising family—at enable them to rise beyond the situation of a drudge. Mechanical tools, at best, they could see nothing in the perspective, but toil, without the cheering consolation of having reared their offspring to occupy a station in life with, to weather the storms of adversity,—coming age—and the many incidental crosses of a poor man's career. They have gained a glorious triumph!

Sir Oracle. They have indeed—and I am confident, there is too much philanthropy existing in the minds of the employing mechanics, generally, to allow the supposition that when they find the good effects of the revised system, they will attempt to thwart its successful continuance. It was remarked in the City Council a some time since, by an editorial member of the Corporation, that he believed a laborer would do as much in ten hours under the present arrangement, as they formerly did in twelve. The remark was in accordance with his thorough knowledge of mankind; it is one in which I fully concur, and it will also hold on the question of an advance of wages. It serves as a powerful stimulant. There, have I my with Fustian, it is a triumph, not of a mob seeking a revolution from unworthy motives—but of a large, and respectable number of our fellow citizens—who have felt the ill effects of a system which, from its harshness of feature, drove them to wrest from their employers terms, which should have been voluntarily accorded them.

Squibb. It is recorded of Pyrrhus of Epirus that after a severe contest with the Romans, where he proved conqueror, he exclaimed:—"Another such a victory, and I am undone"—and I take it that the triumph of the strikes will prove similar in its result. Many of them already see the dangers of their position.

Sir Oracle. Ay, indeed! Will you explain.

Fustian. Rather a difficult task, I assure Squibb!

Squibb. By no means—on the contrary it is so apparent that I am astonished you have not considered it before. For instance—can we suppose, that a building which cost us so much additional to erect it, will rent at as moderate terms as though it was built at the old prices. The builder expended more capital—he will require a rent sufficient to liquidate his additional disbursements. And the mechanic will discover his own rule, that the very important item of rent is proportionately increased.

Sir Oracle. There is much truth in your argument, and I confess that it bears heavily upon the contra advantages.

Fustian. This is an individual case only.

Squibb. And yet it forms but one link of an extended chain of the same nature. The shoemaker, pays more for his leather, and to his workmen—ergo, he must charge more for his articles. The strike may not purchase a cord of hoop without paying more for hoops it brought to his door. The sawyer struck also, he may not receive an additional price for his services. Turn which way you will, the effects of the strike are obvious and galling. Chancing to step into a printing office some few days back, I was amused with the remark of a pert "devil" who complained that since the strike, crackers or biscuit, had risen one cent per pound. "We must strike for more money for establishes while working at nights," said the urchin.—"Our Boss should recollect the rise on crackers, and when he pays us, let the dairy maids will strike, and then we shall have to pay more for cheese."

Sir Oracle. The end of all this will be, you think, that the times will be harmonized to the change.

Squibb. Things will regulate themselves. The operative will receive more money for his services, but it will be filtered through channels unknown before—and when he comes to settle his personal expenses he will find that he has not been in any wise, the gainer. Instead of advancing his interests, he will stand as he did before the strike.

Fustian. The reasoning I conceive to be just, and I regret that it is so—as I do not think the original mode of procuring a sufficient payment for the service the operative has to perform.

Squibb. On that hand, I am with you. But there can be no remedy—as long as self interest prove the secondary principle—not only of the employer, but the employed.

Fustian. Yet you confess the operatives for supposing their interests, to the same principle, as manifested by their employers.

Squibb. Did they advance their interests by so doing? Were they not aware from the aspect of the times, and the rates of prices, as given—from the buying a brick to the building a house—that a revolution could not be safely effected. Did the female working cleaners gain any thing? They indeed deserved all, ay! more than they asked, yet with them their very weakness was the cause of their defeat; with the journeymen, the strength developed produced the same result. But, a truce to the subject. How passed you the 4th, Sir Oracle?

Sir Oracle. In Delaware county, among old associates.

Squibb. And you, Fustian?

Fustian. Why—shem—really—I played ten-pins for want of some more profitable business—it is a day that always hangs heavily with me. As to you Squibb, I suppose you spent it at some one of the public dinners. Did you give a toast? and did the proxy Col. in the clear cry out—" Mr. Squibb's toast to be drank standing."

Squibb. I neither passed it in wine bibbing or gambling. Think me not personal, in saying that I have too much regard for the day, and its recollections, to had it with the enthusiasm of a bacchante, or wear it away in playing ten-pins.

Fustian. Well, well—enough on that subject—I would rather hear you relate your experience.

Squibb. The first explosion of hey patriotism as it came up to my window, caused me to give Morpheus the "go by," and push heavily to the foot of Chestnut street. Once on my way to Burlington, I felt satisfied and took things coolly until I found myself leisurely reclining under an old walnut, in the vicinity of Springfield, discussing the price of lands, the probable value of the harvest, &c. &c., with a patriarchal old Quaker, who has the misfortune to call me,—nephew. So passed the 4th and 5th. On the 6th Squibb was again the slave of his profession.

Saturday Evening Post.

JULY 25, 1835.

☞ We have received a letter from our travelling friend, post marked Utica, but too late for insertion this week. It will appear next week.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Journal of the Franklin Institute for July has made its appearance and contains its usual variety of interesting matter, useful to manufacturers and utilitarians. Its prolific notices of new patents average the usual number (about 60 per month) and proves the American people to be the most inventive in the world. We propose for once to give the titles of the patents, they may interest some of our readers. "A Screw for propelling Canal and other Boats: Sawmill Dogs: an Improvement on Movable Seats: machine for sifting and cleaning Grain: a Spring Carry-All: machine for Moulding Brick: machine for pressing Brick: for manufacturing Wrought nails and spikes: for Doubling, Twisting, Reeling, &c: for making Pitch from gas refuse: Circular Tenter Bars: an Improvement in Fire-places and Stoves: Rail Road Tracks and Wheels: a Side Saddle: the application of Caoutchouc to the Ropes used in Dragging Canon Inclined Planes, &c.: a press for Cotton, Hay &c.: a machine for removing weights, and Loosing and unloading Boats, &c.: a Mortising Machine: machines for Roping Cotton, &c.: for an Easy Chair: Improvement in Construction of Bedsteads: a Thrashing Machine: for Smelting Iron Ore with Anthracite Coal: a Machine for Shelling Corn: a Cooking Stove: Stone Hammers: a Lath Machine: Improved Lay of the Power Loom: a Washing Machine: a Machine for Planting and Covering Corn: Machine for dressing Staves: an Improvement in Oven: for Manufacturing Sheet and Boiler Iron: Improvement in Manufacturing Scythes: a thrashing Machine: an Oven: Machine for Rolling and Breaking cotton Seed: Machine for making Wrought Nails, Tacks, and Spikes: for a mode of do.: Apparatus fo Applying, Abstracting and Conducting Heat: a Brin Machine: Machine for Cutting Grass and Grain Bellows for Furnaces and Forges: a Straw Cutter: a Corn Sheller: a Cheese Curd Cutter: a Machine for Dressing Manilla Hemp, &c.: an Improvement in the Stomach Pump, Cupping Instrument and Breast Pump: Machine for Splitting Palm Leaves: Machine for Planing and Matching Boards: a Flaring Machine: a Safety Lock; Lathe for turning Logs, Bent-tree &c.: Rounding Stones &c.: Cutting Screw Threads: Rending Wheel Tire and Setting Carriage Springs: a Washing Machine: Steel Carriage Springs: Machine for Moulding Bricks: a Clap Board Machine: Horse Power, &c."

Each month the Journal contains descriptions of multitudinous patents, which we should judge would be useful to inventors, as they might learn by it that some of their principles have been invented frequently before.

ANNE GRAY. A novel, Edited by the author of "Quakhy."—Philadelphia, Carey Lea & Blanchard.

This is the reprint of a new English fiction. The Editor in his preface, says, "I am permitted to state that this is a first publication, and that it is the work of a female hand, but I do not mention these things with a view to deprecate criticism."

The work, as we have glanced through it, appears to be well written, and abounds, occasionally, in amusing sketches, and humorous delineations of character. We may probably review it at again.

POETRY OF THE REV. C. C. COLTON.—A volume of poetry has lately been published in London, entitled "Modern Antiquity, and other Poems." They are the productions of the late Rev. C. C. Colton, the celebrated author of "Lacon," and one of the most unfortunate and eccentric men of his age. His laconics are unsurpassed, but his poetry does not appear to meet with the same degree of public favor. We subjoin a fragment, which is said to be one of the best in the volume.

"We, that on these days are thrown,
Must be the oldest Ancients known;
The earliest, modern Earth hath seen,
Was Adam,—in his apron green.

He lived when young Creation pealed
Her morning hymn o'er flood and field,
Till all her infant offspring came
To that great christening for a name.

While Earth, a virgin then, read
His gentle tool without a spade,
And, decked in flowers, danced the plough
To trace a wrinkle on her brow.

Then in his teens, a stripling blithe,
Time worked his wing, but not his scythe,
His leisure, pleasure—his employ
To ripen beauty—not destroy.

Unvoked by science to the sail,
Young zephyrs sported in the gale,
Or wantoned with the pecund wave,—
A truant then, but since a slave.

The youthful Sun with bridal smile,
Kissed ocean—continent—and isle."

FANNY KEMBLE'S BOOK.—The Americans have not been slow in denouncing the Journal of Mrs. Butler. A late number of the London Literary Gazette, contains the following appropriate remarks in relation to this savage and unlady like production.

"The work before us is deformed by graver faults than such youthful imprudence and FEMALE INEXPERIENCE can excuse. There are a flippancy and VULGARITY about it which surprise us the more, coming from such a source; a presumption, and a lack of the finer and higher qualities which adorn the female character, which is vexatious to contemplate in one so gifted."

The London Athenæum pronounces a similar verdict.

"It turns out to be one of the most deplorable exhibitions of vulgar thinking and vulgar expression that it ever was our lot to encounter. The insane desire of being thought one who thought alone, combined with a love of every mischief, has, we apprehend, betrayed Mrs. Butler into a book, which she herself, in a short time, and which all her friends at once will wish, had never seen the light."

It is probable, from all accounts, that Sheridan Knowles, who left this country in high dudgeon, will Fanny Kemble us in the course of a few months.—Our next advices from Murray will, it is likely, confirm the rumour.

THE BRETHREN.—A Tale of The Fronde.—New York:—Harper and Brothers. This is a novel of more than ordinary merit. We read it attentively, from the alpha to the omega, which is more than we can say of any similar work which has lately been published. It is understood that Mr. Herbert, one of the editors of the New York American Monthly Magazine, is the author, and if he had not acquired an enviable reputation by his contributions to that excellent periodical, it would at once have been secured to him by the publication of "The Brethren."

The work in question, is one of the deepest interest. The plot is a good one, and its denouement such as to give pleasure to every reader. Isabella, the heroine, is a character which we particularly admire. She is one of those warm and resolute, yet gentle and devoted beings, which every lady must love. The author has succeeded admirably in the delineation of her character; he has given us a portrait which shows that he is well acquainted with the female heart, and knows how to appreciate its worth. The interview between her and the hero after he had rescued her from her enemies, would do credit to the pen of Bulwer himself. We hope Mr. Herbert will soon favor us with another of his productions, for we feel assured that his success would be certain:—We subjoin a sketch as a specimen of the author's powers.

"It was, as I have said, well nigh eight o'clock, when, drawing off my regiments, I mounted a fresh horse, the third I had used out since the dawn, and galloped at a turnout across the now lonely battle field.

It is a mournful, ay, and a self-deluding sight, a recent battle field. The cold and senseless dead—charger, and he who reigns him—unstretched side by side, in the long sleep they knows no earthly waking! The miserable wounded wretches, groaning and struggling in their grea agony! The very instruments of rescue, and the standards, that lent their pality and to make the bayer wear a glorious seeming, broken and excoriate, torn and gory! The very weapons, and monsters of the carnage, still reeking with the red witness, though no longer wielded by the strong hand, at the bidding of the high heart! It a man can look unmoved on such a sight, assisted by the consciousness that he himself has edged the blade of the immortal Avenger—that his intellect has been perverted, his hand turned aside from its legitimate purpose of benevolence and mutual good, to the destruction, the temporal, ay, and perchance the eternal destruction of his fellow-sinners—I he can look upon this sight, can grapple with his thought, and doing so, feel no remorse, or feel yours, he is no man! Oh, conquerors! conquerors! ye have been called the scourges of a God; but it is at the instigation of a devil!

As I rode fiercely across the weltering field, such were my self accusing reveries, I felt the sin of murder on my soul. For what had I or mine of accusation against them, that I should wield the blade of extermination, weaponing, as it were, the will of others against men innocent to me! I felt though some deep and sudden desolation would be hurled upon my head for the deed. I hearied, in the feeble wailings that loaded the slaughter-tainted air, the muttering of the vengeful thunder! "Never, never again," I cried aloud, in the vehemence of my over-excited spirit—"never again, O Sword! shalt thou leap from thy scabbard, save to do battle for the feeble, and to strike against the tyrant! Never shalt thou bleed in the rush of battle, unless it be on English ground, and in the cause of England! Thy fight is fought; thy prize is won! Grant it—oh grant it, Thou whom I have on this day so grievously offended—grant it, Eternal Ruler and Creator, that not in sin I may be punished for this foul commission!"

"Stand, ho! Stand, or I shoot!" I was interrupted in my wild soliloquy by the fierce challenge of a sleepy sentinel, and the rattle of his heavy arquebuses, as he levelled it upon the ton.

A friend, ho! A friend and officer. The word is Victory. Good night!" And, without checking or swerving from my gallop, I dashed by the astounded soldier without heeding the salute with which he atoned for the abruptness of his challenge. But the incident brought down my spirit from its soarings, to that which was immediately before me, without shrinking from or shunning the thoughts that had suggested themselves. I soon was able to appease them by the reflection that, if the victims were innocent of individual wrong, they were not so in leading themselves as tools and instruments of havoc to the guilty great, to the ambitious and needy adventurer—that rebellion against a lawful ruler, and without a lawful cause, is sin—that I, whatever might be the mortal self accusation of the moment, had been striving in the cause which I deemed honest; and was, if guilty, guilty of misapprehension only, not of stubbornness or willful wrong.

The scene, too, harmonized with my change of feelings; it was now bright and pleasant. The month was that sweetest of the year, young April; and as the winter had been of unusual severity and gloom, so had the opening of the spring been early and most genial. The woods were bursting into the tender verdure peculiar to the season; the herbage was already deep and richly fragrant. The country through which I rode, indicating and of exceeding beauty; and over all a brilliant moon was pouring that flood of sweet and tranquil lustre which, so much lovelier than the glare of the day light, softens every asperity of nature, and, making its very shadows soft and hoary, acts as a gauzy veil to the features of a veiled beauty, rendering that is unlovely, and charming the eye in proportion as it excites the fancy.

No painter's glance or poet's heart could have selected a more lovely or romantic spot than that which chance had selected for our rude encampment. It was a long and narrow glade, stretching gently and softly into a wide stretch of fertile meadow land, through which a broad rivulet lingered, as though its nymph were enamoured of some neighboring lawn or sylvan, and were therefore loath to quit his beautiful abodes. A shadowy wood on either hand, and frequent clumps of forest trees—still bare and leafless, or at the most in early bud, but interspersed with the fresh foliage of the willow and the hazel—spotting the hill-side, gave a park-like air to the untrimmed scenery. Along the summit of the hill, and through the imperfect screen of the wood-land, hundreds of white tents were glimmering in the moonlight; while here and there the rays (broke back,) a keen reflection from the cuirasses of the sentinels, or from the ruby glow of some terrourful fire.—The sounds, too, which floated on the night air, were blended and harmonized into sweetness by the effect of distance. The hum of voices, the merry laugh, the quaint song of the campaigner—hoarse, doubtless, and indelicate from a nearer hearing—came pleasantly on the ear, and which mingled with the hooting of the owls, crying to each other, like answered sentinels, from their woody retreats; and with the remoter bark, long of the household dog.

It is the peculiarity of such a scene and time to soften and subdue the soul, to win it from the storm and strife of humanity, to attune it to holier thoughts, to render it pensive, affectionate, and melancholy; and, if disturbed, most my spirit were not present to these, they were not at least, widely or incongruously different. From latter anxiety concerning the future, and jealous doubtings of my own purity of deed and purpose, I fell into a confiding and a peaceful mood of hope! I slackened my pace; not that I was less eager to join my loved one, but that the rush of the horse, the current of air created by his speed, the very sounds of his swift motion, were painful and uncongenial. Still, I did not, as may be well believed, linger or hesitate upon the road; and, as I began to ascend the first pitch of the hill, I strode into a light canter, that brought me speedily to one of the entrances in the breastwork nearest to my pavilion, and guarded by the faithful Swinars of D'Erlach.

The following glorious sketch offers an excellent subject for the pencil of an artist, and will we trust be shortly embodied.

Before me was a picture that would have tasked and been superior to the powers of the mightiest master that ever limned the human form divine. Through a wide aperture in the canvase rolled the calm soft moonlight streamed down gloriously, filling the small apartment with a sweet and mellow radiance. In it was upon my pallid bed that the broadest pensile of of light was flung, all upon the calm angelic features of her who lay there, forgetful of all her sufferings, and all her sorrows. She was dressed, as I had seen her on that morning, in a plain robe of spotless white, the close corsage splendidly setting forth the symmetry of her person, and the long train falling carelessly over the edge of the couch. There was, however, one guardian, one vigilant and faithful guardian, watchfully at her side, to whom she had so much contributed to rescue—the bloodhound Hector. Erect upon his haunches, he sat beside the bed, his head reaching far above the level of the pillow on which Isabella reposed, and his bright eye glancing in the moonlight like coals of fire, as he rolled them to and fro in anxious watchfulness of his mistress. It was indeed a lovely group. Her beautiful chiselled features, the snowy lids closed, and the long lashes pencilling her pallid but transparent cheek, the profusion of sunny hair—freed from the restraints of the novicial head dress, which had compelled her to assume, and which now lay beneath my feet—glancing like threads of gold among its own dark shadows, her bosom rising and falling in the deep security of innocence, and, above all, that soft and almost terrible expression, that likeness of a longer and colder sleep, which has often pressed so chillingly on my heart, while gazing on the slumbering countenance of one I love. Her left hand fell easily across her lap, and the right was cast round the muzzle and shaggy neck of the dark hound, as though she had sunk into repose while in the act of caressing her canine preserver.

BENJAMIN LUNDY.—This gentleman arrived at Wheeling, Va. some time ago from Tennessee, on his way to the East. The following incident which occurred to him during his passage up the river, we find pleasantly related in a late number of the Wheeling Gazette.

"It is pretty well known, we presume, that Mr. Lundy is poor, very so; all his labor having been gratuitously directed, for at least twenty years past, to the melioration of the condition of the blacks in our country. The announcement of labor, expended in the acquisition of wealth, would have made him rich; but it is doubtful whether, in these twenty years, he has owned at any one time half a hundred dollars. So destitute of money was he on leaving Cincinnati, that he took a deck passage on the steam-boat, the price of which, it is known, is very inconsiderable on these waters. Shortly after leaving Cincinnati, the clerk of the boat ventured to enroll the names of the passengers. O Mr. Lundy's giving him, he asked, "What Lundy?" "Benjamin," was the reply. The clerk hastened off, and told Capt. Bennett that Benjamin Lundy was on board, a deck passenger!" "Show him to me," did the captain, springing from his state room. He was conducted to the deck, where he beheld the philanthropist seated on a box eating his lunch of bread and bacon. Advancing to him he said, "Mr. Lundy, you cannot remain on the deck in any boat that I command. Come with me, sir; you must eat at my table." He was accordingly conducted to the cabin, and introduced. The whole company rose to receive and shake hands with the good man. A young New-Yorker, on inclining him in his turn, said, "Mr. Lundy, denominated my purse. If I have not enough with me, let me give you a draft on New York for my own you may name." Mr. Lundy replied that he had very little money, it was true, and would so he accept his fund offer as to take ten dollars. "Ten dollars!" said the generous New Yorker, "You shall have it—nothing less than fifty." Mr. Lundy peremptorily refused, but at length consented to accept of twenty dollars. And twenty dollars, we are free to say, were never more worthily bestowed. The whole scene is represented as having been one of great interest—very little of which can be imparted to this meager relation."

THE PHILADELPHIA MUSEUM.—The following extract is taken from a notice of the Philadelphia Museum, by a correspondent of the Boston Mercantile Journal, dated Philadelphia, July 4th. "I paid a visit to the Museum this afternoon, and was pleased to see the improvements which have been made in the interior of the building, and the additions to the collection of curiosities, and from Philadelphia to Niagara Falls, and from Boston to Oregon and Mexico, and from Canada to Texas, and from Florida to Nootka Sound, and from Nootka Sound to Vera Cruz, and from Vera Cruz to Tobolsk, and from Tobolsk to Pekin, and from Pekin to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Boston, and from Boston to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Boston, and from Boston to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Boston, and from Boston

Philadelphia Prices Current.

Corrected for the Saturday Evening Post, by Robt. T. Backwell, publisher of the Reporter, Counterfeit Detector, and Prices Current.

FRIDAY MORNING, JULY 24, 1835.

ASHES		Sugar-house, N. York	47 48
Pot, cwt	4 25	do. Patent	43 50
Pearl	4 50 a 00	do. Steam	46 50
BUTTER		Trinidad	30 32
Ital. lb	12 18	Porto Rico	31 34
Ohio No. 1		English French Isl.	30 32
No. 2	9	Brit. & Hayanna	29 31
Ohio		MACKEREL
COAL		No. 1, bbl	23 a 00
Lehigh, ton	4 50 a 5 75	No. 2	17 00
Schuylkill, do	4 50 a 5 75	No. 3	14 50 a 15
COFFEE, Duty free		Bills
St. Domingo, lb	11 12	Linseed, Am. from store	1 25 1 30
Porto Rico	11 13	do. Dutch	1 25
Cuba	11 13	Whale, gal.	45
Laguira	12 13	Sperm, winter	85 1 00
Rio	12 13	do. common	80
COTTON, Duty 3 cts per lb.		PLASTER PARIS
Louisiana	19 22	In Delaware, ton	2 00
Mobile	19 22	In Schuylkill	2 50 a 2 75
N. C. and Va.	18 21	SEEDS
S. C. and Geo.	18 21	Clover, bush	4 50 a 4 371
FREIGHTS		Flaxseed, rough	1 90
To Liverpool, cotton,	1 50	Do. clean, cask
do. flour	1 50 a 2 00	Timothy, bush	1 30 2 75
FLOUR and MEAL		Herds, bush
Baltimore, bbl	6 75	Orchard grass	2 00
Rye	4 50	WHISKEY
Corn, hhd	4 75	Rye jobbing	28
Meal, bbl	3 00 a 3 75	do. bbl	27 28
Corn meal		do. from wagons
Pennsylv. in hhds.	20 00	WOOL
GRAIN		Prime, Saxony fleece, lb
Rye Pennsylv.	1 00	Am. wash, full'd	35 45
Rye, Southern	97 98	do. unwash. blood	33 35
Wheat, Pennsylv.	1 42 1 45	do. half blood	30 32
do. South. red	1 40 1 45	do. tub wash	40 45
Corn, S. C. white	66 67	do. and com.	27 30
do. N. C. yellow	64 65	Pulled, Lambs' lb 1st	35 37
do. N. C. round	1 00	do. blood	33
Oats, Pennsylv.	38 39	do. 2d	30
Barley	75 80	do. and com.	27
Barley, Eastern	80	Foreign, unwashed	25
Rye, Pennsylv.	70 80	do. 1st	35
HOPS		do. 2d	30
Import. entered, lbs	15 16	do. 3d	25
SEEDS		do. blood	30
Cloverseed, lb	5	do. and com.	27
Flaxseed, Rough	1 90	do. Smyrna, A. F. A.	25
New Orleans	23 25	do. lambs	75 1 00

ATKINSON'S SATURDAY EVENING POST.

PHILADELPHIA:

Saturday, July 25, 1835.

OUR OWN CITY.

It appears there are other men besides the exquisite Capt. Hall, who can see nothing to admire in our city of Brotherly Love. Observe what is said by the travelling correspondent of the Boston Journal.

"I cannot like Philadelphia. I have given it a fair trial, and many fair trials,—but I do not "cotton to" its stiffness, its precisiness, its coldness, its cold water washings, its white wooden window shutters, its ever-lasting red brick walls, unrelieved by any thing light or lively in the shape of Venetian blinds, verandahs, porticos, porches, or piazzas. It looks very well on a printed plan, but it is a very odd city in reality. And then its paved streets, innocent of Mc Adamization and gas light, its thousands of watch boxes for people to break their heads against at every corner, and its toleration of that disgusting nuisance of cigar-smoking, by men calling themselves gentlemen, in its streets at evening,—combine to render it far from delightful to me. It is true, there are the United States Bank, the Mint, the Fair Mount Water Works, and the new Exchange, to relieve all this sameness and monotony: but I am constrained to confess that I consider the constant self gratulation and boasting of the Philadelphians upon the score of these attractions, as almost destructive of the pleasure to be derived from an examination of them.

Oh, William Penn! why didst thou ever think of locating a city, on the banks of the Delaware river? and more especially, why didst thou ever ordain that her streets should intersect each other at "right angles!" Depend upon, it thou hast much to answer for: this "stiffness," this "precisiness," is altogether unpardonable. What a glorious immortality would have been thine, hadst thou brought over with thee, on thy pilgrimage to this new world, some of the winding streets, and crooked alleys of the great English Metropolis! And what a pity it is, that we, thy perverse descendents, should continue to make use of "white wooden window shutters," or build our houses of "everlasting red brick," without having even taste enough to relieve the monotony with a solitary "Venitian blind," or "portico," or "porch," or "piazza." By the way, what a delightful allitcation! And then, too, we must pave our streets in our own way, instead of that of the immortal McAdam's, (for the which we beg McAdam's pardon) and put up "watch boxes" at the corners of the street; the latter of which, however, we think should not have been made a subject of complaint, inasmuch as it has been found necessary by our sage councils to "make and provide" a shelter for those whose duty it is to prevent certain people from "break-ing their heads" against the lamp-posts at the "witching time of night." Finally, as to our gentlemen smoking cigars, we have not a word to say in reply; we leave the matter to their own consciences, and the reproofs of Fanny Butler, who at least gives them the credit of being polite enough to put aside their cigars when a lady is passing. This is something.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.—Major Noah of the New York Star, asks if we "shall forever depend upon Europe for the principal portion of our literary pleasures," and adds, in a somewhat heroic strain—"The father of waters as he charges with all his hosts upon the retreating billows of ocean, thunders—no! and Niagara, wah all her world of waters, echoes and re-echoes that indignant, no!"

Without pausing to inquire what the waters of the Niagara have to do with American literature, we think the time has gone by when the question can be consistently asked. The reprints of American books in England, and the translations of American books into the French, German and Italian languages, are sufficient proofs, that Europe, in this respect, is as much dependant upon us, as we are upon Europe.—It has, however, become the fashion, now-a-days, for the editorial fraternity of this country to be habitually talking of the prejudices which, they say, are entertained by the English literati towards American authors; but the truth is, no such prejudices exist; the English press has awarded to American writers, all the praise which they deserve—all, indeed, which they could reasonably expect. Cooper, we will venture to say, is more popular in England than in America; and as to Irving, it was in England where he first acquired any substantial reputation as a man of letters, after having been almost literally compelled to abandon his own country, in consequence of there being no disposition to appreciate his labours. This is too often the way with us Americans. One of our countrymen becomes ambitious of authorship; he writes a book, and manages to procure its publication; it goes forth to the world, but it is an American book, and no one is willing to acknowledge that he has perused it; it is so exceedingly unfashionable, so excessively vulgar to read an American book; and the author, in despair, sets sail in the next packet for London, where, perchance, he is fortunate enough to make an arrangement with Murray, or Bentley, or somebody else, for the publication of another, and the next thing we hear of, is, that a copy of it was found on the toilet table of some Duchess, or Marchioness—no matter who, so that it is a titled personage, whose name is registered in the Court Journal—and then, we fashionable Americans—why, we are ready to break our necks until we, alas, have possessed ourselves of a copy, which, under other circumstances, we would not have deigned to notice. And yet we are continually talking of English prejudices, while, if there is anything to be censured, it is our own narrow minded illiberality—our own reluctance in judging of a native author according to his merits, instead of waiting until he has acquired that reputation abroad, which we, in our selfishness, withheld from him at home.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.—A company has been formed in Louisville, to construct a bridge over the Ohio river, from that city to Jeffersonville, Ia. The cost of the work is estimated at about $300,000. The estimate of Louisville alone, subscribed for two-thirds of the stock issued ately upon opening the books.

EMIGRANTS.—The New York Evening Star says, "From the first of January to the first of July, the number of emigrants landed at this port alone, is fourteen thousand six hundred and seventy four, and up to the present time may be computed at upwards of fifteen thousand; and as the winter months are generally unfavorable to emigration, we are safe in estimating the number which will arrive here in the year 1835, at thirty thousand. Of the late arrivals, we are informed by undoubted authority, that a greater portion of the emigrants were destitute, and required assistance almost upon their landing. Of the number arriving in various other parts of the Union, we have no means of ascertaining."

Unpopular as the subject may be among our thriving politicians, we cannot but think that the time has come when we should enact new alien laws—The happiness and prosperity of our country will depend upon it.

LOVE IN A DILEMMA.

The Breach of Promise case still appears to occupy a large portion of public attention. Whether the fate of the Republic is in any way connected with it, we will not venture to say, but it has at least became a matter of almost as much importance as Eugene Robertson's late balloon ascension from Mexico, upon which occasion the government issued orders that there should be a suspension of all business.

The plaintiff in the case, poor Barnard! seems to be getting the worst of the battle, notwithstanding the quid pro quo of one THOUSAND DOLLARS, which a Jury of twelve "good men and true," allowed him to pocket as an equivalent for his disappointment. The happiness of poor George has been converted into gall, and he can now only be compared to a traveller in the desert, where nothing has the power to soothe his sufferings. His case is indeed, a hard one; and sincerely would we sympathise with him, were it not that we are afraid of incurring the displeasure of the ladies. We confess we have no independence in this matter; their dictates must be implicitly obeyed. If they say Mary H. Power was in the right, why, it is a necessary inference that George G. Barnard was in the wrong—and there is an end of it.

Love, we all know, is a ticklish thing. It is certainly more easily felt than understood. The best definition we can find of it—and we have been at some trouble—is in Hudibras. He says,

Love is a fire, that burns and sparkles
In men as nat'rally as in charcoals.

But love in women, the poets have attempted to prove is entirely a different thing. It is, indeed, say they, her ——"whole existence; man may range

The court, the camp, church, vessel, and the mart,
Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange;
Pride, famine, ambition, to fill up his heart;
And few there are whom these cannot estrange;
Men have all these resources, but women
Only love, although undone."

But this has nothing to do with the calamities of Mary H. Gaul, and George G. Barnard, between whom there appears to have been a courtship of more than five years, and therefore we must express the belief that there was some misunderstanding between the parties, for what, indeed, is so unchangeable as a woman's love? We may rail against the sex—we may talk of their inconstancy—we may accuse them of a want of fidelity; but after all, they furnish the only instances we have of true and unqualified devotion. When a woman once fixes her affections, she loves on the same through every change of time and circumstance. She may be slow in forming an attachment, because she knows that deceit and hypocrisy may lurk in every smile to betray her, but when it is formed, nothing can turn aside the current of her affections. The man whom she has chosen as the object of her love, will appear to her the dearer, in proportion as the voice of detraction is sounded abroad to defame or injure his character. She would sooner believe that the world itself was false, than that he, in whom she had reposed so much confidence—he, in whom she had garnered up her sweetest and best affections—was any thing else then the noble and high minded being which her ardentest fancy had always depicted him. This may sometimes be her delusion—but it is a delusion creditable to her sex. It shows, at least, that she will not permit any sordid motive, or qualifying self-interest, to sway her decision. Woman is not indeed, the type of change which she is so generally represented: the snows of many winters may gather upon her head; the hand of time may furrow her cheek and wrinkle her brow; she may be weighed down in her desolate old age to the very dust; but even then, in the midst of all her sorrows, she has a heart that will beat as true and as fondly for him whom she has been accustomed to love, as in the very freshness and summer of youth. Away then, with those sweeping denunciations of a woman's fickleness—of a woman's inconstancy.

We have made the foregoing remarks, because, in the perusal of Miss Power's letters, she appears to have been perfectly pure and artless. When she had reason to doubt the affection of her wooer, she writes him a letter full of tenderness and endearment; she describes her almost insupportable anguish—entreats him to forgive her—and begs that she may once more reciprocate her love. If he could resist all this, we must confess he has nerves of a firmer texture than our own. It appears, however, that he yielded, but not with that amiable grace and condescension which it became him, and if there was any "reasonable reason," to use the young lady's own words, for her subsequently pursuing the course she did, it was certainly because she observed—for the first time, perhaps, the shrewd and calculating policy which appeared to govern Mr. Barnard in this affair, and which, producing a doubt in her mind of his real attachment—made her resolve, hard as was the task, to blot him forever from her memory as an object unworthy of her love and esteem.

FASHIONABLE HATS.

How capricous are the fashions! A month ago, and it was worth a gentleman's reputation to be seen in the street without one of the Russian, broad-brimed, white hats, wherewithal (an old fashioned word, by the way) to ornament his head. Now, we believe, almost everybody wears them, and, of course, anybody who aspires to be somebody, (that is, a well dress gentleman) must doff the white hat, and substitute the still newer fashion—a black one, differing only in colour, as it is of a similar shape and proportion.

The latter, we really admire; we think it becomes the wearer more than anything we have ever seen; and in addition to this they are likely, during the coming autumn and winter, to be generally adopted—especially among the fashionables who we know generally "rule the roast" in these matters.

In passing Florence & Co.'s Hat store, 48 South Third street, a day or two since, we could not but admire their manufacture of the above article. We think they cannot fail to please the most fastidious. Their hats appear to be of a superior quality, and are finished in a style of neatness and elegance not to be surpassed. The public would do well to give them a call.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.—The following is a portion of a speech lately delivered by Daniel O'Connell, the Irish agitator, at an anti-slavery meeting held in Ireland.

"The honorable and learned gentleman flung this black dishonor on the star-spangled banner of America; in vain did it wave over every sea, proclaiming the honor of the boasted Republic of modern times—THOSE WHO FOUGHT UNDER IT WERE FELONS OF THE HUMAN RACE—(hear, hear.)—TRAITORS TO LIBERTY, TO THEIR OWN HONOR, AND BLASPHEMERS OF THE ALMIGHTY!! The red arm of God," continued the honorable and learned gentleman, "is bared; and let the enemies of those whom he died to save, the black Man as well as the white man, beware of its vengeance. The lightning careers through the troubled air resoundeth amid the howling of the tempest and the rolling of the thunder!"

This time once was, when we believed Daniel O'Connell to be what he pretended, the dignified patriot and statesman. Opinions, like every thing else, are liable to be changed.

The old adage, "A friend in need, is a friend in deed," will be verified by those having occasion to employ the services of the Cockney Dr. Harrison, who advertises in a London paper, that he has been successful in several cases in bringing people to life who have met with the misfortune of breaking their necks. St. John Long may now hide his diminished head. If the Doctor was located in our city, he might do a profitable business during the continuance of the riots—provided, also, he could mend broken heads as well as necks.

THEATRICAL.—A Theatre has been opened for some time at Wilmington, Del., but with what success we are not informed. Miss Mary Duff was engaged for three nights, and made her first appearance in Bianca, in the tragedy of Fazio, or the Italian Wife.

After enumerating some of the numerous projects of internal improvement which are now in agitation in the Eastern States, the Richmond Enquirer remarks—

"Thus they go at the North! The strongest spirit of Internal Improvement is animating the whole Eastern Country. In 1827, there were but two rail roads in operation in the United States—the first was at Mauch Chunk—the other was the Quincy rail road, near Boston. So rare and curious was this mode of communication then considered, that Governor Kent of Maryland and his suite paid a visit to Boston, for the purpose of seeing the Quincy Rail road, preparatory to the commencement of the great Baltimore and Ohio Rail road. A Locomotive was not to be seen. But now Rail roads seem springing up by a sort of magic in every State of the Union. The small State of Illinois has now more rail roads laying down that belonged eight years ago to all the United States. Virginia too, is rousing from her slumber—and shooting her rail roads and Canals in various directions. This is a stirring time—and merily must we exert ourselves, to keep up with the progress of the age."

Beautiful Extract.—We find the following beautiful extract in one of our exchange papers, from Reynolds' Voyage of the Potomac. The work abounds with similar passages—graceful, spirited and eloquent.

SUN-SET AT SEA.

There are but few, perhaps, who have not experienced and felt the charms of evening, as the last golden beams of the setting sun cast a milder glow of mellowing light and shade on all around. It is not romance; there is a high wrought sympathy—a pure and holy feeling, which often passes over the mind in the contemplation of such a scene. We had enjoyed it on shore; but never dreamed that the ocean-tossed mariner was favored with aught so lovely. It was an evening when the troubled waters of the ocean had not wholly subdued from the effects produced by a heavy blow of several days. The sun was slowly declining in the west, making his passage through numerous silvery and golden clouds, which threw upon a bank of other dark vapours which were still hovering in the east, an appearance not unlike billows of fire, undulating like the sea beneath them.

"The sun's bright orb, declining all serene,
Now glanced obliquely o'er the watery scene:
Its heaving surface, lovely to behold,
Glows in the west, a sea of living gold."

Falconer.

To the north and to the south rose masses of beautiful clouds of snowy whiteness, whose upper edges were tinged with gold; these changing into every form above, while the dark red tinge upon the water, or sparkling sea beneath, presented, altogether, a picture so beautiful, that language has not power to describe it; nor could the pencil command sufficiently varied colours, though dipped in the tints of the rainbow, and touched by the hand of a Raphael, to delineate the scene, or impart its beauties to the glowing canvas. None will call this language too strong except such as have not seen, and of course cannot appreciate, the grandeur of ocean's landscape, upon which the oldest and roughest sailor cannot look without a brighter countenance, and a silent but heart-felt acknowledgment of that Being "who stretcheth out the firmament, and holdeth the ocean in the hollow of his hand."

CROSSING THE ALPS.—The last New York Mirror contains Fay's account of his journey across the Alps. It is a most vivid and eloquent description of mountain scenery;—indeed, it forms a picture of itself; and a painter might transfer it to canvass with much fidelity, without any other aid. We make an extract for the gratification of our readers:

"Much as we talk of nature, there are places where we feel that our previous conceptions have been dim and narrow. He, who crosses the Alps will experience this sensation, mingled with a certainty, that thousands of painters and poets, and millions of others, live and die without even suspecting the power of scenery over the mind. Our journey across the Splugen pass, to us, a day memorable forever. Our recollections are of grandeur—gloomy vastness—awful solitude—eternal sublimity. There were moments, during the ascent, of a kind strange and new to me. Whoever seeks something "new under the sun," if he has dwelt on a plain, let him ascend a veritable mountain, and he will find it. Awe, amazement, gloom, wonder and rapture, during which you cannot smile, combine to elevate you. The road winds up, and up—a mild stream, white with foam, thundering all day by stands—a small slopes and cliffs, forests and vales—then a plain and a poor hut, on a ragged town and some beggars. You pause and rest; and then, again, up and up—winding and turning—sometimes through tremendous ravines—sometimes by magnificent waterfalls—sometimes along giddy and yawning gulfs—yet, still, all seems to pand up. Then the face of the cliffs changes, and the grass fades nearly away, and the naked, everlasting rocks lift their grey backs through the soil.—The tempests of six thousand years have beaten against them. Now, the road steals through a desert of enormous stones, broken and shattered—now through a long, dark gallery, wet and dripping—now at the brink of a tremendous precipice, which your imagination would receive as the summit of any mountain; but, anon, the panting, toiling, sweating horses drag you round an angle of rock; and, lo! there lies you overhang other cliffs and other mountains in the sky; piles, swells and pyramids of snow and ice; and, so near their awful heights as to startle you, the whole line runs yet higher and higher, and you believe not that it is your path still above you—and yet it is. The earth is now totally changed. You and your heavy cloak around you in the biting cold. Dark clouds are rolling gloomily over your path, and the white snow shines beneath you, and the winter wind shakes violently the closed glasses of your carriage; and, as the road, still mounting up and up, turns to the right, your face now to the right—now to the left—you catch, far below, such awful gleamings of sublime scenery—such dim, wild depths of azure—such forms of cold blue lifted and built up around you in the eternal silence, and shrouded in mist and storm, that your very soul is hushed and chilled, and you feel as if Death, the King of Terrors, had there fixed his home; and, were a spectre to stand in your path, or to lean and beckon to you from his car of rolling mist, you would behold him without starting, for your imagination can scarcely have exceeded the reality, which, on the plains, would draw all Europe to it as a fashionable resort, is here no curiosity. Its lonely thunder swells and dies away in the interminable solitude. Twenty times we thought ourselves at the height of this stupendous pass; twenty times our course appeared ever mounting far before us—and up, all the cold grew extreme, and the darkness of night overlooked us; and we were completely lost and enveloped in a huge, wet cloud, which roared like a mighty ocean. * * * For a moment or two we were at a loss. Before us appeared only a brink, beyond which imagination painted a chasm of six or eight thousand feet. Gaspero stopped, and took ref around, and he began to encourage our mounting up the night in the sky. At this moment a gust swept our path. The white clouds floated off, and displayed our road descending in sudden angles down, down indefinitely. Off we started, upon a trot, overturning everything in our path. For nine hours, or more than two hours, the roaring of the Rhine, through the village of Splugen, and the lights glimmering in the widows, announced our arrival; and we alighted, for the first time, at a Swiss Inn."

From Bicknell's Reporter.

Banking Capital in the United States.—The following table, showing the amount of Banking capital of the various states of the Union, possesses considerable interest. We have compiled it from the last reports made to the respective legislatures of the states, but it is proper for us to mention, that since these reports were submitted, several new institutions have been chartered—the Northern Bank of Kentucky, the Merchants Bank of Baltimore, the Charleston City Bank, &c., and that because, in order to make the table complete, the reader should add the capital of all recently chartered banks. It will be perceived that the Banking capital of this state amounts to little more than seventeen millions, while in 1834, that of Massachusetts amounted to $26,389,450—and New York has more than thirty one millions.

Maine,	2,724,000	Georgia,	8,034,681
N. Hampshire,	2,154,308	Alabama,	4,305,207
Vermont,	911,980	Mississippi,	11,000,000
Massachusetts,	29,805,450	Louisiana,	33,664,755
Rhode Island,	7,138,840	Tennessee,	5,247,927
Connecticut,	5,086,015	Kentucky,	10,000,000
New York,	31,481,460	Ohio,	5,986,625
New Jersey,	6,375,000	Indiana,	1,500,000
Pennsylvania,	17,084,444	Illinois,	1,700,000
Delaware,	2,000,000	Dist. of Columbia,	3,355,905
Maryland,	9,270,091	Florida,	1,800,000
Virginia,	5,604,500	Michigan,	2,250,000
North Carolina,	3,324,725
South Carolina,	7,331,218		$219,250,549

On Monday of last week, the hands employed in the quarry of Mr. Harman Lydacker, situated under the high range of mountains, below Slaughter's Landing, in this county, were alarmed by the cry of murder! proceeding from a female voice, but were totally unable to discover the source from whence it came. At the same moment the crew of the sloop Henry Edward, which was passing down the river, saw something suspended in the side of the mountain resembling a female form. With commendable promptitude they immediately put about, drop anchor, and jumping into the small boat, rowed to the shore. On arriving at the foot of the mountain, they found it to be a young girl, (aged about 16,) hanging by one foot in a cedar bush, about 100 feet from the base, and 60 feet from the top of the perpendicular rock. To reach her from the bottom was impossible, and providing themselves with a rope they hastened around to the top, from which they lowered it. The unfortunate girl was yet able to hit it around her waist, and by this means, was drawn from her perilous situation, and rescued from impending and almost certain death. She proved to be Miss Phebe Wells, a niece of Mr. Benedict Wells, who had left his residence without the knowledge of his family, with a view of going to New York to see her friends. Unacquainted with the passage of the mountains, it is supposed, she was unaware of the danger, until she found herself descending the precipice, and the rock being perpendicular, her fall could only have been broken by the slight shrubbery which projects from the side of the cliff, until, luckily for her, she struck the cedar bush, in which her foot fortunately caught. Her situation here may be imagined, it cannot be described; hanging by one foot to a slender bush, and a yawning gulf of rocks and stones 100 feet below—unable to extricate herself, and for aught she knew, far beyond the reach of human call. It is not at all probable that in five hundred thousand cases, one could have passed the cliff she did, and not have been dashed to pieces long before reaching the bottom. She was not materially injured, and was conveyed to her friends in New York by the sloop Henry Edward, the Captain and crew of which are entitled to the highest commendations for their promptitude and humanity.—North River Times.

William Swain of Philadelphia.—About twenty years ago, William Swain, then a bookbinder was affected with a severe scrofulous disease, which baffled all the efforts of his physicians. He extended all his little earnings in procuring medical aid, and was taken to the Pennsylvania hospital, his disease having been pronounced incurable. While at the Hospital he undertook to cure himself, and composed a mixture for that purpose which had the desired effect. He was soon restored to perfect health, with a constitution invigorated by the disease through which he had passed. He then tried the virtues of his medicine on others afflicted with similar disease, and found that it proved equally efficacious. This mixture was Swain's Panacea. It not only restored its inventor from sickness to health, but it has raised him from abject poverty to immense wealth. He makes it a and a good use of his wealth, contributing largely to the improvements of Philadelphia, and adding with his name and his purse a benevolent and charitable institutions.—N. Y. Times.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.—Judge Story, in speaking of the late lamented Chief Justice Marshall, held the following appropriate language:—

It had been his (Judge S.'s) good fortune to be near him for 24 years, to know his thoughts intimately, and to enjoy with him the utmost freedom of communication; and he could not but add, that he was impressed with the depth of his (Justice Marshall's) feelings as a father, a husband, a brother and a friend—feelings more pure than he had thought could have existed in the bosom of any human being. His labors were eminently directed to the preservation of the constitution, and of the Union. His admirable mind had no desire to expand the constitution beyond its just limits. He endeavored to give to that immortal the construction which he, better than any other man, knew was entertained by its framers; and to express the thoughts which belonged to their minds. As an expounder of constitutional law, he had conferred lasting honour on his country. He had shed an unextinguishable glory around his high office,—a glory which would brighten as time rolled on. Such a man should die as he had died—like a shock of wheat fully ripe,—preserving all his glorious faculties to the last. During the last winter, when laboring under the disease which has since proved fatal to him, he had been ardent and constant in all his duties, evincing all his ordinary intelligence, and wonderful comprehensiveness of judgement. He (Judge S.) believed the last thought this venerable man ever breathed was for his country, and the perpetuity of the Union. Let them then be comforted that Providence, in taking him from them, had taken him at such a period of his life. Judge Story concluded by directing the clerk to enter the resolutions upon the records of the court.

MICHIGAN.

The Detroit Free Press of the 1st inst. contains "the entire Constitution of the State of Michigan," as adopted by the Territorial Convention at Detroit. We annex the second article.

1. In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the state six months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who may be a resident of this state at the time of the signing of the constitution, shall have the right of voting as aforesaid; but no such citizen or inhabitant shall be entitled to vote, except in the district, county, or township in which he shall actually reside at the time of such election.

2. All votes shall be given by ballot, except for such township officers as may, by law, be directed to be otherwise chosen.

3. Electors shall, in all cases, except treason, felony or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at elections, and in going to and returning from the same.

4. No elector shall be obliged to do militia duty on the days of election, except in time of war or public danger.

5. No person shall be deemed to have lost his residence in this state by reason of his absence on business of the United States, or of this state.

6. No soldier, seaman, or marine, in the army or navy of the United States, shall be deemed a resident of this state in consequence of being stationed in any military or naval place within the same.

The eleventh article is to this effect,—

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever be introduced into this state, except for the punishment of crimes of which the party shall have been duly convicted.

An Aeronaut in a blaze of glory.—If ever mortal man was immersed in honours, Mr. Eugene Robertson is the man. There is a long and interesting description in the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin of his ascension from the city of Mexico, taken from his own narrative and the journals of that city. General orders were issued by the government for the suspension of all business, and the inhabitants turned out en masse to witness the successful, first ever made in that part of the world. It took place from the paseo de toros, where 15000 persons of the upper classes had congregated. The President ad interim, of the republic, the magistrates of the city, the professors of the college of Mines, and dignitaries of all orders and ranks were present. When the balloon ascended, the air was rent with shouts of long live Robertson, long live the aeronaut, long live France and the French people, while the ladies dear souls, wept torrents of tears. This however was but the beginning of the honours showered upon the Frenchman. He descended about seven leagues from the city of Mexico. The authorities of that city despatched detachments of soldiers into the part of the country where it was supposed he had descended, and numerous parties of citizens set out with the view of escorting him home. On his way to Mexico he passed through Kalapam, distant about four leagues from that city. The ladies of the place requested permission to present him with garlands and wreaths of flowers, and the authorities prepared a sumptuous feast for him. In coach and six had been despatched from Mexico to convey him to that city, and a detachment of dragoons formed his escort. As he approached the city of Mexico, he was met by a grand cavalcade, and a long array of carriages. When the triumphal car arrived at the city, it was preceded by twelve guards of honor, to clear the streets of all obstacles that might impede the procession. The inhabitants from terraces and the doors and windows of their houses, saluted him with enthusiastic cheers. He was escorted to the palace, where the President and principal officers were waiting to receive him. Thence he went to the College of Mines and held a learned contest with the professors of that institution, and afterwards was received in public. In the evening he was received at the theatre by a large concourse of citizens. When he arrived there, the audience rose to cheer him, and insisted that he should show himself on the stage. The curtain was raised and he made his "first appearance," accompanied by the manager, who recited a piece of poetry in his praise. He was then escorted into the private boxes of the folks, and Countesses and Marchionesses—for it seems they have these things in Mexico—intoxicated him with sweet speeches. The public prints were for a number of days filled with sonnets and odes to his honor, and there was a strife among the Mexican poets as to who should be most hyperbolical in his praise.

He received not only empty praise, but solid pudding, having cleared about twenty thousand dollars by his highflying experiment. We have told this long story by way of showing to the "native talent," which has lately wasted itself on the desert air in ballooning, that there is a fair field in Mexico for its exercise. Let our balloon men emigrate. They may rise upon it, they they are not properly appreciated here. What a great man would Sam Patch have made himself, if he had performed in Mexico.

WASHINGTON IRVING.—We are pleased with the following remarks, which we copy from a late number of the National Gazette, in relation to the genius and writings of our distinguished countryman, Washington Irving. They do credit to the taste and feelings of the editor.

"Who is like him, and whom is he like? With all that eagerness for imitating authors whose works have obtained the great est vogue, which characterizes the present age, where are his imitators? and who is the author, living or dead, whom he can be said to have imitated? The fact is that his principal qualities cannot be copied in the way that those of many of his literary compeers have been—it were vain for any one to attempt to ape his humor and pathos; each is too peculiarly sui generis to afford any chance of success to an endeavor of the kind. And as to the resemblance, his works may bear in some respects to those of Addison and Goldsmith, it is but the consequence of a kindred genius, whilst they are distinguished and individualized by traits especially their own."

Mr. O'Connell's opinion of his countrymen in the United States.—Mr. O'Connell, at a late meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society of London, speaking of the Irish in this country, who do not advocate as he does the lunatic doctrine of abolition, says of them:

"He was glad such Irishmen had left their own country. They were amongst the objects of the curse of St. Patrick, who had banished all poisonous and venomous reptiles from the sod of Ireland. The learned member for Dublin then in an eloquent manner, expressed his abhorrence of America, which profess and the most enlarged principles of liberty, refusing to emancipate 2,500,000 of human beings from the degradation and horrors of slavery. The star spangled banner of America was stained with Negro blood. They refused their slaves even the blessings of education, they exclaimed their bodies, and they would also exclaim their souls. If they suffered this horrible system to continue they would write themselves liars to their own declaration. He would proclaim them from the place on which he then stood, blasphemers of their God, and what some of them might think of still greater consequence violators of their sacred honor."

TRENTON, N. J., July 11.—The large new saw mill of Messrs. Fish, Cook & Co.—the new work of Messrs. Maynard & Hutchinson—and an extensive paint mill fitted up by Mr. Dwyer—in all commenced running during the past week. These events form new items in our account of improvement. In the course of September, the large oil mill, now being erected by Mr. Joseph Moore, it is expected will go in to operation, and about three months after the capacious merchant mill, being built by the same enterprising gentlemen, will be under way. In addition to these gratifying evidences of prosperity, we learn that our city has attracted the attention of capitalists and speculators abroad, whose visits usually follow closely the first sure premonitory symptoms of an increase of business in a neighborhood.—Such a survey has been made within the past ten days, the most important of which is the disposition of Daniel W. Coate, Esq., of all his building lots, mills, in the adjoining village of Bloomsbury, for $40,000. The purchasers are a company of gentlemen residing in New York. Notwithstanding speculation, however, building lots may still be had at low prices, and rates and water power, the usual advantage of their locality considered, are here selling now at more reasonable rates than any where else in the Union. How long they will be rated so cheaply we cannot say.

Simple Means of Preserving Health.—The pub lic health would be greatly promoted, and ringworm prevented or cured, by washing the head daily with vinegar and water. One part vinegar to three parts of water should be applied to the head with a sponge. All scheme, public and private, large families, and persons of sedentary habits, ought to use this simple and cheap remedy, which, besides preventing or eradicating all diseases of the skin, will be found to impart a beautiful and healthy hue to the most delicate complexion.

RECEIPTS BY MAIL.

July 17, received from		Henry Schmidt,	2 00
George Boggs,	$57 78	James Herring,	2 00
J. J. Harrod,	2 00	Oliver Brabin, Esq.	3 00
A. F. Woodward,	2 00	A. Brockway, Esq.	3 00
Merlin Merrill,	2 00	W. J. Cole, Esq.	5 00
Elias Palmer,	1 00	S. Green, Esq.	2 00
C. C. Waller, Esq.	2 00	Ethan Allen, Esq.	2 00
S. Prescott, Esq.	2 00	H. Bartlett, Esq.	2 00
J. Stow, Esq.	2 00	W. W. Thomas, Esq.	5 00
Martin Collins, Esq.	2 00	W. Fouike, Esq.	10 00
H. S. Beakes, Esq.	4 00	S. Dickson, Esq.	24 00
J. G. Caldwell, Esq.	10 00	E. Laugheed, Esq.	5 00
W. W. Wood, Esq.	2 00	D. B. Wheeler, Esq.	2 00
July 18.		July 21.
Chas. C. Scott,	2 00	Hosea Millison,	1 00
Elias Dewitt,	2 00	Guy H. Bell, Esq.	5 00
Daniel C. Hays,	3 00	W. Hanks, Esq.	1 00
J. H. Wallace,	5 00	James Wells, Esq.	10 00
John S. Rollins,	2 00	C. F. Hammond, Esq.	2 00
Revile Fuller,	1 00	M. Russell, Esq.	15 00
N. Harvey, Esq.	5 00	July 22.
T. Fisher, Esq.	5 00	D. F. McCrary	2 00
V. M. Long, Esq.	5 00	R. F. Worthington,	5 12
B. Robeson, Esq.	1 25	R. McClure, Esq.	*1 00
B. S. Stivers, Esq.	1 00	Henry Manly,	96 50
July 20.		July 23.
J. W. Trumbull,	52 00	A. H. Wood,	20 00
Samuel Linton,	5 00	W. H. Skerrett,	10 00
Shepard Garbutt,	5 00	John B. Shaw,	2 00
George C. Gibbs,	2 00	S. Newberry, Esq.	2 00
A. S. James,	2 00	J. K. Place, Esq.	2 00

COMMUNICATED.

Died at Salem, N. J., on the 15th instant, EZRAH BROOKS, Esq., formerly editor and proprietor of the Salem Messenger. Mr. Brooks, we believe, is from the state of New Hampshire and located himself at Salem about 15 years since, an entire stranger, where he established the Salem Messenger, the first paper that fully succeeded in that flourishing town—by constant, quiet industry and strict integrity he received the richest confidence and support of its inhabitants—but through the vicissitudes of fortune, and a fatal disease, he has early been called from all that was near and dear to him. This small tribute of respect is humbly made by one that knew him in prosperity and adversity, and respects his memory.

Forgery.—A man named Henry Wilbur was last night arrested in Spring street by officers Stevenson and Tompkins, on a charge of forgery. It appears that Wilbur was in the habit of purchasing empty champaigne bottles of innkeepers, and selling them to Messrs. Maintain & Wright, extensive dealers in bottled cider, at the corner of Southand Beekman streets. Attached to their establishment is a bottling cellar, under the charge of a man named Cornelius Sullivan, where the bottles to be sold were taken, and where the seller received a ticket of acknowledgement. This the seller carried to the store, and on presenting it received his money. Wilbur, after receiving his ticket, would previous to presenting it at the store, increase the number of bottles acknowledged in it; for instance, adding "0" to five, six, seven, &

Variety's the spice of life,
That gives it all its flavour.

MY AUNT.

She must have eaten, poor nutjuice,
Some sprite between her bread;
She declares that the Bulwer novels
Are things not fit to be read;
She thinks that to flirt is a crime—
And I suppose she does—Female,
And she thinks the "Female Law,"
In every article truth.

My Aunt has got to her spectacles,
She is very well versed in politics,
And dabbles your pastry stuff;
She imagines that all the clergymen
Are in wine as wrong as he;
She thinks that Pope is a poet—
But there she agrees with me.

She knows she can tell the mark that is left
On a woman's lips by a kiss;
And of all her erotic theories
I am sure just to meddle with this;
She might tell the track of a bird through the air,
Or the track of a ship on the sea—
But the viscious beast, not the visible lip,
The stamp of a kiss will be!

Can the Spice?—A young girl was presented to James I. as a English prodigy, because she was fifteen. The parents who introduced her boast of her proficiency in ancient languages. "I can assure your Majesty," said he, "that she can both speak and write Latin, Greek, and Hebrew." "These are trifles, whereunto for a damsel," said James; "but pray tell me, can she spin?"

A Chip of the Old Block.—Charles Mathews being asked what he was going to do with his son, (the young man's profession was to be that of an architect) "I say," answered the comedian, "he is going to draw houses like his father."

Schoolmaster Wanted.—The following is a literal copy of a letter lately sent to a neighbouring parishioner.—"Yoe oblige of yoe kiss on ex ore I hev a Bad heved on Ed in my New Hills and hey hev lost my Happy Tight.

Can by a Pun.—Why are a miser's fingers like a prince? Ans. it up Because they are to seeing princes.

A waggish candidate coming in the course of his canvass to a tailor's shop, "What we look for here," said he, "are sinners, not saints."

Surveying.—"My mare wants to know if your mare will lend my mare your mare's pack-saddle to make our bay a long mare." "Mr. Jones, presumption and impudence are two quite your mother if she'll be kind enough to lend us a bag of that fetkin butter she bought to day, that's a mere little mare; and just clean us a mare of them pests and ask that your father caught this afternoon, and bring them down to our mare." "Mare—and I'll certainly try you the first bright mare I find in the orchard; my gander on the whole," said the boy, "we shan't want that pack-ass of yours."—Dedham Patriot.

Runway and Gibbs were engaged in some spirited repartee, which expanded a rupture between them, and excited very angry feeling. In a passion Mr. R. declared he could buy and sell Gibbs! "Yes, by gar," said Gibbs, "if you did buy me, you would have to sell me, but I can buy and sell Rey, you know." Mr. R. then became in a rage, and struggling with such a man, and with chagrin, he consoled himself upon his head and left the great money king.

A shrewd little fellow belonging to the New York Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, being asked at an exhibition, "Why do you come here?" replied, "In my opinion, we have come here to make a show, and get praise."

A layman in Providence, who occasionally exhorts at evening meetings, thus expressed his belief in the existence of a Deity:—Brethren—I am just as sure-doot that there is a Supreme Being as I am that there is a Providence, and that I have for a certainty, or I yesterday received from there a lot of three hundred barrels, fresh, superfine, which I will sell as low as any person in town."—Alb. Daily Adv.

Bottling Cider.—Not long since, on board one of our Lake boats, through the neglect of the cook, the coffee came on the table unsettled, to the great annoyance of those who preferred coffee to tea. During the repast, an old gentleman in conversation with the waiter, observed that he was much amused running up the North River; after landing at Catskills, the Turkey came around begging his bill; "Gentleman who come on board at Catskills, please step up to the cashier and settle;" "A Quaker, a Methodist, and a Universalist, were talking together, when Brigham Young